The wind changed at least once for me. I had all my nets on the one side, but realised at some point I was going the other way, I had to detach all of them and put on opposite side! Probably not needed. I placed collector nets at the front of my raft to start with, and somehow managed to get my raft turned around (use paddle while brushing past ...

Wind velocity or speed is measured by a cup anemometer, an instrument with three or four small hollow metal hemispheres set so that they catch the wind and revolve about a vertical rod. An electrical device records the revolutions of the cups and calculates the wind velocity. The word anemometer comes from the Greek word for wind, "anemos."
